Ideal “rainy day fund”

Still, the last year has been, as Lauzon candidly admits, a confusing time, with slowing economic growth and rising interest rates causing all sorts of dislocations in sectors and stocks. The fund could be said to be designed for that kind of environment, and Lauzon describes it as a “rainy day fund.”

That makes it sound like the safe, steady kind of vehicle for wiser, older people, and Lauzon agrees that it is best suited to income clients, to whom it pays out monthly dividends. It’s ideal for clients who want to pay off something like property tax, he says.

“You put $100,000 into it, we’re going to earn you $5,000 to $6,000 a year,” he says, adding, “Say I have to create a stream that just pays my property tax every year, or, if I don’t need any income, I could put it on DRIP” – a dividend reinvestment plan that allows investors to reinvest their cash dividends in additional shares or fractional shares of the underlying – “and I’m compounding that every year.”

“Protecting capital is important. This fund is designed to do that with low costs and diversified investments”

With income at its core, the fund needs a good spread of dividend-bearing holdings, and ideally, Lauzon likes every one of them to pay a dividend – but at the very least he tries to achieve 90 percent-plus in that camp as fund holdings.

Lauzon’s aim is to keep the fund producing high single-digit returns in the long run. To that end he keeps a minimum of 10 percent in fixed income. Meanwhile, its biggest sector allocation currently is focused on the global energy transition, while Lauzon “loves REITs this year” and is bullish on financials and healthcare.

But although he owns Apple and Microsoft, he is not overweight on technology stocks because he says it is hard to find good-quality dividends with technology companies. The sceptical theme continues when it comes to consumer stocks, in which he also takes an underweight position.

He doesn’t own staples, as he thinks their run is over, and he believes the sector is calling out for a market correction. It is an area he will avoid for another quarter or two, he says.

As befits an income fund, Lauzon is careful to shield it from any risks to its assets from squalling market clouds on the horizon. He says, “Protecting capital is important. This fund is designed to do that with low costs and diversified investments. So, it can be an all-weather fund. If someone just has one fund only with their money, this could be it because of its revenue diversification. I am giving you income and you can take it in cash, or you can DRIP it and compound it. I am giving you a low fee, and I am giving you active management, which checks a lot of boxes.”

Extensive due diligence

Its low fee is another of its attractive features for investors, especially during inflationary times, making it very competitive with ETFs. "We should probably raise the fee on the fund because it's probably too cheap! But we are not going to do that," Lauzon laughs.

All this strong performance while protecting capital takes a lot of careful work to achieve, and Lauzon takes the fund's due diligence seriously. Company results are interrogated with prosecutorial zeal before any investment is made. Lauzon is alert to the fact that some businesses may try to embellish their results to make them look better to potential investors.

He says, "There's a point where a company is just pulling the wool over your eyes by saying, 'I'm giving you a six-percent yield.' But if you look at the numbers, they're only earning three. So you've got to look at the balance sheet, especially in a rising rate environment."

Any signs of insider trading are also carefully scrutinized by Lauzon and his team. They are decidedly keen on management owning a lot of stock in the company that they are pitching for investment and want alignment of interests between management and shareholders. Although the Income Plus fund is not an ESG vehicle, Lauzon still uses the insights he has gleaned from it to tailor his stock-picking. In particular, he applies the lessons of good governance to ensure that management compensation is appropriate to a company's growth trajectory.

The economic outlook for the next year currently hovers between a drizzle of rain and prolonged torrential downpour, depending on the forecaster. It's weather for which the fund has been built. Lauzon takes a relatively upbeat view, describing himself as being in the soft-landing camp, and thinks that a mild recession could be on the cards.

"It's a really good time to talk to your clients about getting value," he observes.

And that's at the heart of the fund's philosophy – that and getting a good performance for a passively managed price.
